No more Wild West and Sights at the Tolumer Town 8 This but there may be battles with property

PROPERTY giant Joe Levy's Stock Conversion and Investment Trust Ltd. could be ousted from Tolmers Square if a new proposal just drawn up by two journalists gets the go-ahead from Camden Council.

Former "Private Eye" coeditor Christopher Booker, who lives in Hampstead, and Bennie Gray, a freelance writer who has worked in the property world, have submitted details of their new scheme. to Camden Council chiefs.

Their move come just as officials were setting the seal on the agreement between Stock Conversion and Camden Council for the development of the 104 acre Tolmers Square area.

Under the original deal, Levy's company were to be given planning permission for a tower block of offices which M: Gray estimated could pur £20 million profit into Stock Conversion's lap.

The Bloker-Gray "blueprint" which if proved workable could pave the way for similar schemes in other areas where local authorities are forced to give unpopular planning permissions to get their

giamt

hands on land for housing, offers the same scheme.

But instead of ploughing the profit into Stock Conversion, it could come the way of Camden Council to distribute as they see fit. Merchant bankers are Merchant bankers are already prepared to back the plan, which would involve buying up Stock Conversion's heldings in the area by compulsory purchase. According to Mr Gray, the price paid would still leave the company with a profit while Camden could reap the rewards from the office block.

The suggestion has been given a cautious reception in Camden Council circles. The leader of the council, Cllr. Frank Dobson, said: "I think we will say to Stock Conversion that we have received an alternative offer and we feel duty bound to investigate it. We'll need to look at it in several stages."

Several Camden councillors were openly critical of the deal with Stock Conversion and some are wondering whether a scheme like this could break the stranglehold the developers have been getting on Camden.

Alderman Alan Greengross, who was Tory planning chairman when the Stock Conversion deal was first thought of, believes this plan misunderstands the basic difficulties and implies that municipalisation is the only solution to London's problems. Other critics point out that Booker and Gray do not own any land in the area — and Stock Conversion do.

But reaction from residents' groups who face a similar plight — in Central Hampstead, where a plan between the council and the Canfield Investments group is in the cosultation stage, and Camden High Street, where there is a fear that the developers are taking over — is favourable to any proposal which could break stranglehold.

O Monday's housing day opment sub - consider meeting gave the such cool reception. Base of town clerk, Mr Bran W son: "There is a lot of a vestigation that has a carried out. It is not cle what financial bear it have made their cook sions on and it is could whether a CPO took Stock Conversion wou proceed."

25,25,11 7 + & soot